FREEZE DRY

Freeze-drying is the best method of preserving food today as it eliminates moisture from the food by freezing it without subjecting it to high temperatures. The freeze-drying technology involves turning food into a solid state and then "sublimating" the frozen moisture in the food into vapor without passing through the heat, unlike other technologies like hot air oven, retort, and sterilization.

Freeze-dried food is a process of removing moisture from food by freezing it and then subjecting it to a vacuum to remove the ice through sublimation. It is a highly effective method of preserving food because it removes water, which is one of the main factors in spoilage. Once the food has undergone freeze-drying, it can be consumed immediately as a crispy snack, powdered form or used as ingredients in supplements. Alternatively, it can be rehydrated with water to bring it back to its original form and consumed as fresh food. The freeze-drying process preserves the taste, color, texture, and nutrients of the food, making it taste and look like fresh food.
